Fingal council calls time on bin service

Fingal County Council is set to become the latest local authority to exit the household waste collection market with a plan for full privatisation from the end of this year.

The decision of the council's management to stop collecting bins follows a consultant's report which found that the service would make a minimum loss of €7 million in 2012.

County manager David O'Connor has written to county councillors saying that it was no longer possible to subsidise the loss-making service. There would be no compulsory redundancies, Mr O'Connor said and bin service staff would be redeployed to other areas of the council.

Experts to review power line

JOANNE HUNT

THE MINISTER for Energy Pat Rabbitte is to establish an expert international commission to look at the controversial North South electricity interconnector

Pat Rabbitte said the commission which would look at "the case for, and cost of, undergrounding all or part of the Meath-Tyrone 400KV power lines". He will finalise the composition of the three-person commission over the next few days.

The Minister said the group would be required to complete its work by October and report back within six months.

Proponents of the interconnector say it is needed to improve electricity competition by reducing constraints to the all-island electricity market and also to improve security of supply.

The establishment of the commission follows the collapse last June of the planning process for the interconnector which was estimated to cost €280 million.

An error in the original application for the line through Meath, Cavan and Monaghan forced the State's electricity network operator, Eirgrid, to withdraw the application during a Bord Pleanála hearing into the issue. A review found incorrect information was supplied by ESB International.
